Is your community challenged with immigrants and refugees needing financing? It can be exceedingly difficult for immigrants in the United States to access capital for small businesses and working capital. Without credit history or a business track record, lenders are traditionally hesitant to lend to immigrants and refugees. So, how do immigrants and refugees secure financing? How do immigrants get access to affordable and flexible capital for starting a business? Not surprising, there are a handful of creative organizations and programs that have tackled this difficult task. These programs are found throughout the country and specialize in underserved financing needs. This month during the CDFA // BNY Mellon Development Finance Webcast Series, our expert speakers will discuss their approach to unlocking capital for immigrants and refugees in your community.
