

Bond Case Briefs

Municipal Finance Law Since 1971

How Much Do States Rely on Federal Funding?

There's a wide range of dependence across and within the states. Here's a state-by-state look at how welfare, education and roads could be impacted by the next budget that Trump signs.

As Congress debates the budget, states are eagerly waiting to hear how it will affect them.

Updated data from the Census Bureau's 2015 Annual Survey of State Government Finances published last week indicates that federal aid made up nearly a third of all states' general fund revenues in fiscal year 2015. The single largest line items in states' budgets include federal funding for transportation, Medicaid and other social assistance programs.

The survey, which provides a detailed portrait of how states generate and spend money, suggests states' reliance on federal money varies greatly. Even larger discrepancies exist across individual areas of state government.

We've compiled data below showing how much of each state's budget is tied to federal aid across select major spending areas.

Continue reading.

GOVERNING.COM

BY MIKE MACIAG | MAY 22, 2017

Copyright © 2025 Bond Case Briefs | bondcasebriefs.com